Settlement house to break barriers

Two Baylor students will have the opportunity to interact with the Waco community on a daily basis, possibly beginning in the fall.

Weeding, painting, gardening and cleaning outside the 2301 Colcord Ave. house, where the two students will live, was the focus of volunteer work by Baylor service organizations Saturday in association with the Good Neighbor Settlement House-Waco.

Dr. Laine Scales, Baylor professor of higher education, said the house is in the process of becoming a modern-day settlement house, modeled after the 19th century settlement house movement.

Scales said the settlement house experience has potential to be incorporated into Baylor classes such as the BIC, social work, education, business, and any relevant subject. She said university students in the 18th century established a gathering place for people in their neighborhoods to come and fellowship together.

This idea of community, she said, is a part of social work history.

Scales told the volunteers people in modern-day neighborhoods stay disconnected from their neighbors because of economic, social and racial differences. In the Sanger Heights neighborhood, where the house is located, the residential make-up is 50 percent Latino, 25 percent African-American and 25 percent Caucasian, Scales said.

The settlement house is a way to break the various types of bar-

Antioch severs bonds of slavery with UnBound

By MEGHAN HENDRICKSON
REPORTER

Hundreds of Baylor students and faculty, city officials and adults joined together for one purpose Sunday night: to combat sex trafficking in Waco and beyond.

UnBound, a new anti-human trafficking organization, launched publicly during its first education and prayer meeting at Antioch Community Church on Sunday night. Although UnBound is an initiative that originated with Antioch, volunteers are not limited to the local church body.

Elizabeth Griffin, UnBound director of outreach, said anyone who wants to be involved in helping to bring an end to sex slavery in Waco and throughout the world is welcome to volunteer.

The meeting kicked off with an introduction to UnBound by Susan Peters, a pastor of Antioch and a member of UnBound's leadership team. Peters said UnBound's mission is to open people's eyes to the reality of human trafficking — both on the local and international scale — and organize efforts to combat the issue head-on.

Orlando, Fla., senior Claire Berlinsky helped lead worship at the event and said she is committing to serve through UnBound in any way the Lord calls her to, whether that is through raising awareness or serving in more hands-on and practical ways.

"My greatest hope for UnBound is to see people saved," Berlinsky said, "to put faces on statistics and to see, in a practical way, that God can move and prayers have weight." UnBound has developed six main ways for volunteers to get involved in the fight against sex trafficking:

- Working with the Waco Police Department through its victim services group
- Matching missing person files to victims marketed online via organized research
- Participating in prayer groups and prayer drives
- Advocating in social media and social networks
- Participating in community outreaches and activities
- Helping with UnBound's administrative activities

Baylor social work professor Jennifer Smyer, director of global mission leadership, gave an educational presentation about sex trafficking at the meeting.

Smyer received her master's degree from Baylor with a focus on human trafficking and the church's response to it. Smyer said she has hope in the face of something so painful because she believes in the power of God.

According to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, sex trafficking includes "the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision or obtaining [of victims] through force, fraud or coercion for sexual exploitation."

Smyer said just one of these elements of sex trafficking has to be present for a situation to be considered "trafficking."

The theme for Smyer's presentation was "Eyes Wide Open." Smyer said evidence of human trafficking is easy to miss when people are not looking for it. "Let it be said of us that we are ones that have our eyes wide open just as he [God] does."

Smyer said it is important for people to be educated about sex trafficking so they might educate others — perhaps those who are

'Mass Effect 3' launched

By MATT HELLMAN
REPORTER

BioWare, a label of Electronic Arts Inc., released its new action role-playing game (RPG) 'Mass Effect 3' today.

Its trailer debuted Feb. 19.

As a continuation of its prequel, 'Mass Effect 2,' the story-based game follows the theme of saving Earth from the alien race known as the Reapers.

"With 'Mass Effect 3,' we're taking players on a more personal journey, even though the scope is bigger than ever — an all-out galactic war," Casey Hudson, executive producer of the Mass Effect series, said in a June EA press release announcing the game's release date.

'Mass Effect 3' features a multiplayer mode as a new feature to the series, allowing for co-operative play that links back to the main player's campaign.

"I'm cautious about the multi-player option since the series itself is predominantly a single-player franchise and introducing multi-player abilities could take away a bit from the game," Southlake sophomore Nicholas Behren, an avid gamer who is familiar with the series, said.

"BioWare is trying to make an effort to appeal to the different tastes of gamers. I'm interested to see what the final product will be," Behren said.

The game will also feature a new twist to the role-playing format by offering three pregame selections: the action mode that allows the player to focus on the action while having a pre-set story line, the story mode which emphasizes decision and conversation selections, and the "Role-Playing Mode" that follows the same game play as the rest of the series.

'Mass Effect 3' will combine intense action, in-depth plot and complex relationship role-playing in order to intrigue and involve players in building suspense that will make them want to keep playing. Dr. Dan Shafer, assistant professor in the film and digital media department, said.

"Certainly, a game that has suspenseful elements can be more enjoyable than a game without those elements, as long as the

Laura and Barbara Bush headline first ladies' conference

By JAMIE STENGLE

DALLAS — Laura Bush and her mother-in-law, Barbara, talked about life in the White House — from the joys of having their own chefs to making the landmark their home — and briefly dipped into current politics at a conference on first ladies on Monday.

Barbara Bush told about 300 people attending the conference hosted by the George W. Bush Presidential Center that the current campaign is the worst she's seen.

"I hate the fact that people think compromise is a dirty word. It is not a dirty word," she said.

Former President George W.

Former first ladies Laura Bush, left, and Barbara Bush take part in a panel that was part of the conference "America's First Ladies: An Enduring Vision," on Monday at SMU in Dallas.

Bush introduced his wife and mother at the event held on the campus of Southern Methodist University, where the presidential center is under construction.

"I have the honor of introducing the best first lady ever," Bush said, pausing as his wife and mother each pointed at the other. Then he continued, "Mom, would you take a tie?"

"Obviously, I don't mind being surrounded by strong women. I was raised by one, I married one, and I believe we're raising two," he said.

The conference featured a discussion with historians on the influence of first ladies throughout history, a panel on the role of social secretaries to first ladies and a discussion by photographers about documenting the women.

"The thing to me that is so remarkable about the women who have assumed this position is how much guts they have, how much brains they have, stamina that is just beyond imagination and a willingness to rise above it and just do it," said Allida Black, a research professor of history and international affairs at The George Washington University.

The conference was a collaboration between the White House Historical Association, American University and the National Archives, which oversees presidential libraries.

Similar conferences focusing on other first ladies are being planned, including one set for the fall on Lady Bird Johnson at her husband's presidential library in Austin, said Anita McBride, who served as Laura Bush's chief of staff in the White House and chaired the conference. Santorum gave skewed view of higher education

Editorial

Quick fact: Six out of 10 college students will lose their religion after becoming indoctrinated by liberal professors.

At least that's what Republican presidential candidate Rick San-

"It is ridiculous to think wanting others to obtain further education means wanting them to renounce religion."

torum said he believes in a Feb. 26 interview on This Week. Santorum quoted unattributed statistics to claim students lose faith in college, after President Barack Obama said he wants every American to receive at least one year of higher education. The day before, Santorum told a group of activists for Americans for Prosperity in Troy, Mich., that Obama was a snob for his comment on education, saying not everyone is built for college. "There are good decent men and women who go out and work hard every day and put their skills to the test that aren't taught by some liberal college professor trying to indoctrinate them," he said to the group. "Oh, I understand why he wants you to go to college. He wants to remake you in his image. I want to create jobs so people can remake their children into their image, not his." What Santorum is excluding here is the possibility that the president was meaning all forms of high education. A four-year degree or higher may not be for everyone, but that does not mean technical school or community college would not be beneficial. Combined with his speech on the effects of education on religion, Santorum seems anti-higher education. It is ridiculous to think wanting others to obtain further education means wanting them to renounce religion. Experts have come forward since Santorum made his claim, saying there is no indication that religion is affected by education. In fact, biopsychologist and Psychology Today blogger Nigel Barber said a higher standard of living is what causes a decline in religion. Coming from Santorum, who holds three degrees, this stance on higher education is fascinating. Obama's hope for increased education was not a stab at those who are uneducated, like Santorum is taking it to be, nor is it an indicator that Obama wants to make people like him. There is nothing wrong with a technical career, and Obama's statement does not claim that there is either. Education helps create better-rounded, knowledgeable people. Americans, as voters and citizens, should be well educated in order to make better-informed decision about the future of our country. If anything, as a candidate looking to get the vote of the working class, Santorum should be promoting increased education opportunities for the middle class. He has criticized others as elitists before, and his message seems to be received well by the working class. But it is more elitist to believe a higher education isn't for everyone. The working class should want a candidate seeking to help them have the best lives they can.

This means receiving an education for self-betterment, not just to have access to desk jobs and a retirement package. Santorum needs to re-evaluate his stance on higher education for everyone and think more critically about his words. After all, if Obama is a snob for wanting Americans to receive a higher education, then we're snobs too.

Private school makes no guarantee of future success

I recently got a text from my mom, a police officer in my hometown, about a man I know who got arrested again. She said it was disappointing because he has had everything handed to him, but he keeps messing up. His parents have a lot of money, he went to Catholic school with me since kindergarten and he had every opportunity in the world. But instead of succeeding, he parties every night and got arrested. At first I agreed with my mom, but then I thought, what correlation does money and private school have with a person's morals and life choices? There's none that I can see. People tend to think that sending their children to expensive private schools will put them in a better environment and in the company of good people, and in turn, their children will grow up to be respectable adults. However, this is not always the case.

Kayla Reeves | Reporter

My high school prided itself on being an award-winning, religious, basically awesome college prep school with a 100 percent graduation rate. What they don't tell you is they manipulate the graduation system so that everyone is able to graduate. Students failing classes can be put in a program where teachers "tutor" them, but they must think tutoring means letting them take tests open-book and giving them homework answers. If the students are still failing, they are allowed to walk the stage at graduation as long as they promise to finish their credits afterwards. This is obviously an attempt to hold up a good reputation, not to prepare kids for college. So why do we expect private schools to provide a better education? Also, I went to school with the same group of about 45 kids since I was 4 years old, and my grade was actually considered one of the most well-behaved classes according to all of our teachers. About half of my former classmates have either babies or criminal records now. So why do we expect private schools to promote morality? Sure, it is totally possible to get a wonderful education at schools like this. I did it. But you can't reap the benefits of private schooling unless you want to. If you coast through it and disregard the rules, you will not get anything out of it. If you do your work and learn both the scholastic and Christian values instilled in you, then you will graduate with all the skills you need for college and life. But still people assume that a good school equals a good person. This is because we tend to associate a teenager's worth with their money, parents' reputation, school, etc. And people have done this for centuries. Ancient Athenians even used the word (καλός) to mean both physically beautiful and morally good, because in their minds, good looks and good ethics always come as a package deal. We've moved past that physical judgment, but not far. It is always a surprise to my mom when someone from high school gets arrested because she doesn't know him or her personally. She judges the person based on his or her parents and the fact that the person went to a supposedly good school. However, it is usually not a surprise to me because I saw how little these people cared about school, and I knew what they did on the weekends. And the old friends of mine who are succeeding in college and planning their futures are the ones who made an effort and worked hard back then. There really is no reason for people to assume that kids will grow up to be respectable adults, because it is mostly based on the way children are raised at home and the personality they were born with. If they want to be hard workers, they will be. If not, we shouldn't be so shocked. Kayla Reeves is a sophomore journalism major from Flint and is a reporter for the Lariat.

Lariat Letters: Military draft would work well

I appreciate very much that Daniel Houston took the time to express his views on the draft in his Feb. 29 column, "Young Americans must abolish military draft," using his constitutional right to freedom of speech. However, I do disagree with a number of his points. First, under our Constitution, Congress has the right to declare war. It is our duty as citizens to elect responsible people who will not needlessly involve us in armed conflict. Remember how many who were "gung ho" to invade Iraq never served a day in the military. Second, I think an argument can be made that, had the draft been in force in the early 2000s and fully implemented, we would not have invaded Iraq because many members of Congress would have had sons and daughters serving in the military and would have objected strongly to that move. Third, our "voluntary military" is being bled. One only served one 13-month tour in Vietnam. Now, we have military members serving several tours in combat — and the suicide rate is very high. Fourth, as former Secretary of Defense [Robert] Gates said in a TV interview last year, every young American should serve two years of service in some form (military, teacher's aide, inner school tutor) because "the freedom we enjoy is not free." Finally, as one who served four years in the USAF as a supply officer from 1962 to 1966, the military then reflected a cross-section of the population. In supply officer's school, I met classmates from Harvard, Yale, Brown, Texas A&M, Tuskegee and Howard. I did not feel "enslaved" because I faced the prospect of being drafted in 1962. Lest some view me as some right-wing militarist, know that I am a Presbyterian Church (USA) elder who tutors at an inner city high school and who supports the recent change to our Book of Order allowing the ordination of gays and lesbians. I am also a past master of my Masonic Lodge. — Allan H. Floyd President Barack Obama meets with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu Monday in the Oval Office.

U.S., Israel discuss force versus diplomacy in Iran

By BEN BELLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Taking sharply different stands, President Barack Obama urged pressure and diplomacy to prevent Iran from getting a nuclear bomb while Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu emphasized his nation's right to a pre-emptive attack. Even in proclaiming unity on Monday, the leaders showed no give on competing ways to resolve the crisis.

Seated together in the Oval Office, Obama and Netanyahu at times tried to speak for each other and sometimes spoke past one another. The two leaders are linked by the history and necessity of their nations' deep alliance, if not much personal warmth, and they both used their moment to try to steer the agenda on their terms.

"I know that both the prime minister and I prefer to resolve this diplomatically," Obama said. "We understand the costs of any military action."

If he agreed, Netanyahu said nothing about sanctions or talks with Iran, or Obama's position that there still is time to try to deter Iran peacefully.

Instead, Netanyahu drew attention back to Obama's acknowledgement that Israel is a sovereign land that can protect itself how it sees fit.

"I believe that's why you appreciate, Mr. President, that Israel must reserve the right to defend itself," Netanyahu said. "And, after all, that's the very purpose of the Jewish state, to restore to the Jewish people control over our destiny," he said.

Israel, he added, must remain "the master of its fate."

Across days of comments, speeches and interviews, Obama and Netanyahu left no doubt about where they stand on Iran. Far less clear is whether they have done anything to alter each other's position in what has become a moment of reckoning over Iran, and an important foreign policy issue in the U.S. presidential race.

Obama's aim is to dissuade Israel from launching what he considers to be a premature and dangerous attack on Iran.

The leaders spoke to the media at the start of their meeting, not at the end. That left no opportunity for them to reveal how their discussions went, and it reduced the possibility of repeating last year's remarkably blunt scene.

When they last sat in the Oval Office, in May, Netanyahu lectured Obama in front of reporters as differences over Mideast peace unfolded.

This time, their body language as they spoke was not so glaring but still telling: Obama addressed the media around the room; Netanyahu spoke directly to Obama and locked on him.

Netanyahu said later Monday that Obama "understood Israel's position" that it has the right to self-defense.

Both leaders see a nuclear-armed Iran as a nightmare that could threaten Israel's survival and potentially allow terrorists to grab unthinkably deadly power. Their difference is not over whether force may be needed — Obama has been specific on his willingness to use it — but whether the time for such a drastic step is nearing.

Israel fears it may soon lose its window to take out Iran's nuclear facilities; Obama sees a longer period for intervention, based on Iran's current nuclear capability and the toll of growing sanctions. He has put increasing emphasis on the political, economic and potential death toll that could come with opening a new Mideast war.

There are other election-year stakes for Obama. He is under pressure from Republican rivals, and even some Democratic allies, over his backing for Israel. That perception, in turn, can play an important role in swing states such as Florida, where there are many Jewish voters, and in Obama's ability to raise money for his campaign.

Obama often defends his pro-Israel record and sometimes bristles about being questioned about it. He declared his commitment anew with Netanyahu at his side.

"The United States will always have Israel's back when it comes to Israel's security," he said. Netanyahu took it further.

He said Americans know Israel is their only reliable democratic ally in the Mideast, and that Iran sees the two countries as inseparable enemies.

"For them, you're the Great Satan, and we're the Little Satan," Netanyahu said. "For them, we are you and you're us. And, you know something, Mr. President — at least on this last point, I think they're right. We are you, and you are us. Israel and America stand together."

Iran insists its nuclear program is peaceful. It has called for Israel's destruction.

Although Israel says it hasn't decided whether to strike Iran, it has signaled readiness to do so within the next several months. The United States sees a longer timeline to the moment when a military strike might be appropriate partly based on different views of when Iran would pose an imminent threat.

A senior Obama administration official said it would take upward of a year for Iran to build a working weapon once it started work on one. That was an unusually specific estimate and offered a window into the U.S. argument to Israel that the crisis with Iran is not as dire as some in Israel have painted it.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity to reveal internal thinking about Iran's capabilities.

Netanyahu's White House visit came as U.S. and Israeli politicians flocked to the annual conference of a prominent pro-Israel lobby, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. Netanyahu was to address the group Monday night; GOP presidential candidates Mitt Romney, Rick Santorum and Newt Gingrich will on Tuesday.

A top House Republican, Majority Leader Eric Cantor of Virginia, took some veiled shots at Obama's Iran approach in addressing the AIPAC audience Monday.

"America's role is not to put its hand on the scale and balance it against Israel," Cantor said. "America's role is to put its fist on the scale to weigh down the terrorism, fanaticism and anti-Semitism of Iran and its proxies."

and one of the most charismatic protest leaders, was the first to suggest that supporters remain on Moscow's streets and squares to turn up the heat on Putin.

For Putin, the opposition move raised the specter of the 2004 Orange Revolution in Ukraine, where demonstrators camped on Kiev's main square in massive protests that forced officials to throw out a fraud-tainted election victory by the Kremlin-backed candidate.

The government's response Monday night was fast and decisive. Lines of officers in full riot gear marched into tree-lined Pushkin Square and forced protesters into waiting police buses. About 250 people were detained around the city, police said.

The crackdown followed a rally that drew about 20,000 people angry over an election campaign slanted in Putin's favor and reports of widespread violations in Sunday's voting.

Putin commands the loyalty of police and the military, whose wages were recently doubled. Following Monday's massive show of force, the urban middle-class forming the core of the protests could be more reluctant to attend future demonstrations.

Navalny — who sought to electrify the crowd with a passionate call of "We are the power!" — was among those detained, along with opposition leader Sergei Udaltsov. Both were released from police custody a few hours later.

"We are calling for peaceful action of civil disobedience, and we shall not leave," Navalny shouted to the crowd. "We know the truth about this government. This is the government of crooks and thieves."

"We will keep on fighting until we win," he said.

Super Tuesday looms

Contenders prepare for 10 voting events

By DAVID ESPO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — On the eve of their Super Tuesday showdown, Mitt Romney and Rick Santorum strained for an edge in Ohio on Monday and braced for the 10 primaries and caucuses likely to re-define the race for the Republican presidential nomination.

Newt Gingrich, though winless for more than a month, campaigned in Tennessee and issued a stream of signals that he intended to stay in the race.

In this year's race marked by unpredictability, Romney's superior organization and the support of an especially deep-pocketed super PAC allowed him to compete all across the Super Tuesday landscape and potentially pick up more than half of the 419 delegates at stake.

Santorum cast the race in biblical terms, his David vs. Romney's Goliath. Even that "is probably a little bit of an understatement," he added.

By contrast, Romney projected confidence. "I hope that I get the support of people here in Ohio tomorrow, and in other states across the country. I believe if I do, I'll get the nomination," he said.

Primaries in Ohio, Georgia, Massachusetts, Vermont, Virginia, Oklahoma and Tennessee plus caucuses in Idaho, North Dakota and Alaska make Tuesday the busiest day of the primary season.

Unlike previous Republican campaigns, when a primary winner would typically win all of a state's delegates, allocations this year generally reflect the split in the popular vote.

Romney kept his focus on the economy in a final sprint across

Ohio, the state that has drawn the most attention and television advertising. Primary polls show him with momentum in a close race with Santorum.

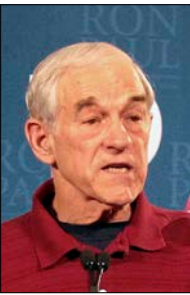

"Other people in this race have debated about the economy, they've read about the economy, they've talked about it in subcommittee hearings," Romney said dismissively of his opponents. "But I've actually been in it. I've worked in business, and I understand what it takes to get a business successful and to thrive."

Santorum, who narrowly lost Michigan to Romney last week, said that no matter how much his rival spends, "conservatives will not trust him, will not rally around him this primary season. ... We will be the nominee."

He said he looked forward to the day when Gingrich drops out and clears the way for him to challenge Romney one-on-one. "And when we do that, we'll win," Santorum said.

Gingrich, the former speaker of the House, was having none of it.

Seemingly confident of a primary victory in Georgia, where he launched his political career more than three decades ago, he unveiled a new television commercial in Tennessee promising to reduce the rising cost of gasoline. Eager to demonstrate his staying power, he said the commercial would soon begin running in Alabama and Mississippi, which hold primaries next week, and he announced a list of supporters in Kansas, where caucuses are on the schedule for Saturday.

Paul

Romney

The fourth man in the race, Texas Rep. Ron Paul, campaigned in Idaho after a weekend visit to Alaska, where he hopes to claim his first victory of the campaign.

Romney has won four contests in a row, including a double-digit victory in Washington state caucuses on Saturday.

He has 203 delegates in the Associated Press count, while Santorum has 92, Gingrich 33 and Paul 25.

It takes 1,144 to win the nomination at the convention in Tampa, Fla., next summer.

Romney's itinerary on Monday underscored the extent to which the campaign for the nomination has changed from closely watched statewide contests into to an all-out battle for individual delegates.

While he hoped to win the Ohio primary outright, he arranged stops in Canton and Youngstown, in and around areas where Santorum isn't eligible for all the delegates available on Tuesday.

Santorum was hampered by his failure to file any delegates in three of the state's 16 congressional districts.

That meant he was forfeiting any chance at nine of the 63 at stake, even if he won statewide.

More damaging to their hopes of stopping Romney, Santorum and Gingrich failed to qualify for the Virginia primary ballot, and Romney appeared in line to capture all 46 delegates there.

Baylor gamers excited for new ‘Assassin’s Creed’

By JAMES HERD
CONTRIBUTOR

You stare out onto the vast plains of the Holy Land, admiring the overwhelming landscape, when all of a sudden you hear jungle drums and you take off running. From atop the colossal buildings you see a corrupt official giving a demonstration of his power, and you head in that direction. Jumping off of the building, you prime your blade and successfully pierce his jugular, killing him instantly. You are an Assassin, and this is the world of ‘Assassin’s Creed.’

After 10 games, countless comic books, and a major motion picture in the works, Ubisoft has officially announced the upcoming ‘Assassin’s Creed III,’ which is set for an Oct. 30 release. Along with this announcement comes much skepticism and excitement about both the setting and the character choice.

Ubisoft’s third-person blockbuster, which first released in 2007, chronicles the tale of Desmond Miles in the year 2012, who descends from a long anthology of Assassins. These assassins secretly fought for the freedom of mankind against the evil aristocratic Knights Templar. Using the Animus machine, Desmond is allowed to relive the lives of his assassin ancestors in order to uncover lost secrets which will benefit the modern day Assassin Order in the waging war against Abstergo Industries, the modern-day front for the Knights Templar.

By stepping into the shoes of both Altaïr ibn La-Ahad (literally Son of None), stoic twelfth century assassin from the Holy Land, as well as Ezio Auditore, Italian Nobleman turned Assassin, Desmond is able to learn more and more about the Assassin Order and of an impending doom facing the world, at the end of 2012 A.D.

The setting this time around is Colonial America, 1700s, which means gamers are bound to have allies or enemies in General George Washington, Thomas Jefferson and maybe even Ben Franklin. According to the released cover art for the European release, which shows our heroic unnamed Assassin about to deliver a tomahawk to an unwitting Redcoat’s face, it seems that our anti-hero is of Native-American descent, which, along with the setting, some longtime fans of the series aren’t too happy about.

“The traditional theme and feel of Assassin’s Creed does not fit into a revolutionary time period,” said a longtime fan of the series, San Antonio freshman Micah Smyth.

However, fans of the series will know that previous games have always hinted to the United States being involved in the war between Assassins and Templars. Besides, out of all the possible locations they had to choose from, including Feudal Japan, the Russian Revolution and Ancient China, they chose this time period for a reason, and gamers will find out that reason come release time.

Houston freshman Taylor Couch said he likes how the setting is going to have the historical background but is not going to be focusing entirely on the American Revolution itself.

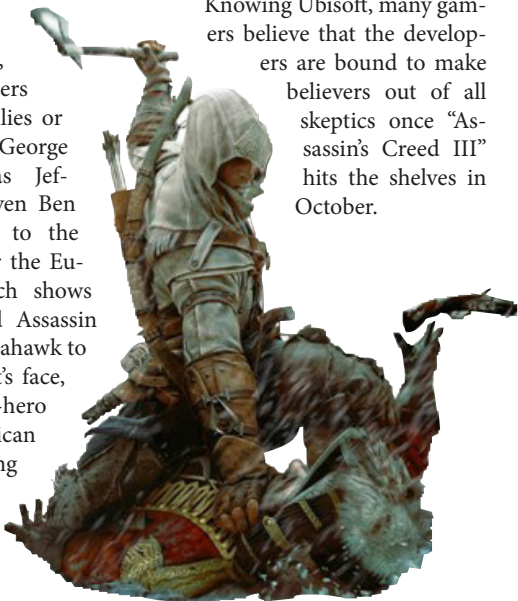

Couch also said he enjoys how there will be not only jumping across the buildings, like in previous entries, but it will also feature free running through dense forests, which he says is a welcome change for the series.

Along with this new environment, gamers are certain to have new weapons lining their arsenal. Judging by the exclusive trailer that hit the Internet on Monday, gamers will have a tomahawk with the center carved out to resemble the logo of the Assassin Order, as well as a bow and arrows, which will help with long range killing.

In the trailer, the new assassin can be seen performing a melee combo on an unsuspecting Redcoat soldier, in which he stabs him in the head and then proceeds to use the soldier’s own gun against him. Judging by only the trailer, it seems this will be another compelling addition to the hit franchise.

“Assassin’s Creed III” follows the example that other numbered titles have set in the past. Anyone will be able to pick up the game and play, without knowing much about the series thus far.

Knowing Ubisoft, many gamers believe that the developers are bound to make believers out of all skeptics once “Assassin’s Creed III” hits the shelves in October.

‘Game Change’ takes look at Palin

By RICH HELDENFELS
McCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

If you need another demonstration of the star power attached to Sarah Palin, look no further than “Game Change,” the movie airing on HBO at 8 p.m. Saturday.

The film chronicles Palin’s role in the 2008 presidential campaign, where she was plucked from the relative obscurity of the Alaska governorship to be John McCain’s vice presidential running mate. Julianne Moore plays Palin — marvelously, by the way — with Ed Harris as McCain and Woody Harrelson as McCain adviser Steve Schmidt. The production also includes real news footage of some Palin events, with Moore edited in.

Scripted by actor-writer Danny Strong (“Recount”), “Game Change” is based on the book of the same name by Mark Halperin and John Heilemann. But the book dealt with both sides in the 2008 campaign, including the long conflict between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton in pursuit of the Democratic nomination for president.

The McCain / Palin saga doesn’t even begin until the book is about half done; still, the filmmakers (among them director Jay Roach, also of “Recount,” and executive producer Tom Hanks) have opted to focus on the Palin story.

Of course, it’s a good story, and she became a major figure on the national stage regardless of what you think of her politics. “Game Change” is relatively faithful to the book, and like the print account it makes clear that Palin was chosen hastily and without the vetting that had accompanied other contenders.

And she was exactly what the campaign wanted, at least on paper: more conservative than McCain’s first choice, Joe Lieberman (played here by Austin Pendleton), and so more attractive to many Republicans; a very effective speaker and, at least for a time, a game changer for the Republicans trying to match Obama’s dramatic rise.

To be sure, the movie shows

Palin as preparing poorly at key moments, but that’s part of the record. “Game Change’s” problems are less about what Palin does than in how the film as a whole works.

As good as the acting is, the movie feels very careful, as if it was written and produced with the awareness that Palin would have lawyers checking every scene. So we don’t get very far into the inner life of Palin, offered instead her behavior and the perceptions of people around her. (It’s pretty clear which characters were major sources.) As viewers, then, we do not get much more than what we already knew.

Besides, the Obama-Clinton campaign was a much better story.

An Introduction to

QUANTUM Gradnamics

During the first half of the 20th Century, scientists struggled to explain graduation phenomena that could not be accounted for by classical Newtonian graduation mechanics*.

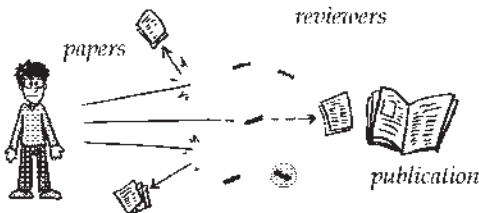

In particular, scientists struggled with the paradoxical dual nature of the relationship between grad students and their advisors.

On the one hand, graduate students were known to produce discrete papers like their supervisors and assumed to be intellectually on par with them.

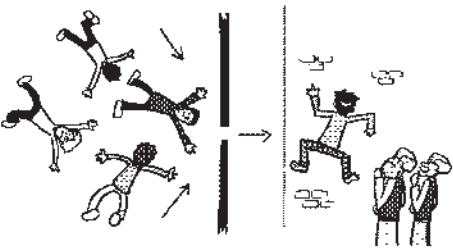

Yet simple experiments showed that graduate students had no idea what they were doing and only followed what their supervisors told them to do.

Thus the question became: are graduate student indentured servants (slaves) to their supervisors, or are they as intellectually capable as professors (part equals)?

This became known as the “Slave/Part-equal Duality” and it forms the basis for the branch of physics called Quantum Gradnamics.

Ernest Rutherford’s “Toiled Submission” experiment demonstrated that academia is made up of indiscrète matter that is largely empty.

The infamous slit experiment, wherein grad students made to pass through a narrow slit (quals) are later found in a scattered and incoherent state.

Lady Bears finish undefeated year, look to main goal

By Krista Pirtle

Junior Brittney Griner notched a career-high 41 points Saturday against Iowa State, leading the Lady Bears to a 77-53 victory at the Ferrell Center.

Baylor went undefeated in conference play, and its 31-0 record is the best in program history.

"It's an honor, but it really doesn't mean anything until you win a national championship," junior Destiny Williams said. "I think we'll all be pretty proud of that. Give ourselves credit for working hard and not allowing our opponents to make as many shots to come away with a win. It's a work in progress and there are things we have to correct, but it's an honor and something we would love take along the way."

Head coach Kim Mulkey was voted as Big 12 Coach of the Year.

The Lady Bears will now head to the Big 12 Tournament beginning Thursday in Kansas City, Mo., where they hold the top seed. Winning this tournament is second on Baylor's bucket list for this season.

"Never do you ever think that you are going to go undefeated," Mulkey said. "You just can't think like that because there are too many good teams. But if you reflect on it today, these guys that you get to coach ... wow. It's hard to go through the kind of schedule we went through and maintain your focus, maintain the excitement for the game, take everyone's best shot, and still win a basketball game. That's pretty uncommon. We're pretty appreciative of it. It's on the backburner now. We're going to try to win three games in the Big 12 tournament, but we're focusing on those last six."

For Iowa State, junior Anna Prins led her team coming off the bench with 17 points, going 4 for 8 from downtown.

Griner missed only three shots on the afternoon.

"She just keeps getting better," Iowa State head coach Bill Fennelly said. "I think that's to her credit and to the coaches. She's not just a tall kid. She's a basketball player, a great basketball player. Her footwork is good. Her timing is good. Look at how many post players in this country have more assists than turnovers. That's unheard of in the women's game."

Fennelly said he knew Griner would produce monstrous numbers so he had his team focus on containing Williams.

liams recorded a double-double with 15 points and 11 boards.

From tipoff to halftime, the game was played at Iowa State's tempo, allowing the Cyclones to work deep in the shot clock and hit seven treys.

Then with 17 minutes left in the game, Baylor went to a 2-2-1-zone full court press, immediately resulting in back-to-back turnovers.

"I'm going to give my assistant coaches credit for that," Mulkey said. "They kept bugging me the first half to do it, and being hard-headed or stubborn I didn't do it. I also didn't do it at the start of the second half. Then I had them in my ear wanting to change the pace of the game, and it was a great decision. We were playing at Iowa State's pace as they were hitting threes all over the floor and penetrating."

From then on the Lady Bears finished on a 39-13 run.

Bears fall in Ames, drop to No. 4 seed

By Greg DeVries
Sports Writer

No. 11 Baylor basketball wrapped up its regular season Saturday with an 80-72 loss at Iowa State, making the Bears the No. 4 seed in the Big 12 tournament.

The Bears led at half 37-30. Junior Pierre Jackson headed Baylor's attack with 18 points on 6 of 9 shooting in the first half. As a team, the Bears shot nearly 44 percent from the floor and held the Cyclones to less than 38 percent shooting. More importantly, Iowa State was just 2 of 13 from 3-point range.

In the second half, the Cyclones came out firing. Cyclone guard Scott Christopherson, who had just two points in the first half, scored 21 points in the second. Every starter for Iowa State finished in double figure scoring.

"Some of [the 3-pointers] were contested. We can live with that. Some were scouting report errors. We made mistakes on how we wanted to guard or cover certain plays or individuals," head coach Scott Drew said. "They had timely second-chance opportunities."

Cyclone forward Royce White finished with 11 points, 11 rebounds and four assists. As a team, Iowa State shot over 53 percent from the floor and over 58 percent from 3-point range in the second half.

"Because we couldn't get stops, it affected our offense," Drew said. "In the first half we were able to get some transition buckets and [we] were able to get some easies that we didn't get in the second half."

The Bears, meanwhile, shot 4 of 15 from the arc and less than 40 percent from the field. Foul trouble hindered the Bears from the start of the game.

Baylor was whistled for 23 fouls, including four on Pierre Jackson, who finished with a game-high 35 points, and four on freshman Quincy Miller. Every Baylor player that stepped on the floor was whistled for at least one foul.

Associated Press

No. 11 Iowa State guard Scott Christopherson drives around No. 55 Baylor guard Pierre Jackson Saturday in Ames, Iowa. Iowa State won 80-72.

Iowa State earned the No. 3 seed in the Big 12 tournament. The Bears, as the No. 4 seed, will play No.5 seed Kansas State at 11:30 a.m. Thursday.

"[Kansas State] is a great offensive rebounding team, and they just pride themselves on being tough," senior Quincy Acy said. "We just need to match their intensity."

Four players from Baylor earned 2012 Big 12 postseason honors. Freshman Quincy Miller was named the Big 12 Co-Freshman of the year alongside Oklahoma State's LeBryan Nash. Miller also received All-Big 12 honorable mention and Big 12 All-Rookie Team.

"[Miller] was already skilled [when he arrived]," Acy said. "Freshmen run into walls and learning curves and stuff like that. The main thing with him is keeping him positive, never let him get down on himself. You might see sometimes he might miss a couple shots and gets down on himself. I just tell him to keep playing and keep shooting ... just making sure he stays positive and help him on and off the court."

Acy was named to the Big 12 All-Defensive Team and All-Big 12 second team with teammate Pierre Jackson.

Jackson also made the Big 12 All-Rookie Team by unanimous selection and the Kansas City Star's All-Big 12 first team.

Sophomore Perry Jones III was named to the Kansas City Star's All-Big 12 second team and the All-Big 12 third team.

Baseball splits weekend

By Greg DeVries
Sports Writer

Baylor baseball wrapped up the QTI Baylor Classic this weekend, finishing 2-2 and bringing its overall record to 9-4.

The Bears kicked off the Classic with a 4-2 win over the University of California, Irvine. Junior left-handed pitcher Josh Turley earned the win for the Bears, his first in three starts.

"It was a typical Josh Turley type of outing. I think it's very much what he is like when he's on," head coach Steve Smith said.

The Bears dropped the first game of their Saturday doubleheader against Lamar University 8-0. Lamar scored in all but three innings.

The second game was against UC-Irvine. The Bears won 6-1 on the arm of senior right-handed pitcher Trent Blank.

"[Blank's pitching] is unbelievable. That's about it. I mean, hopefully he keeps it up all year because he is a big tool for us right now," senior right-handed pitcher Joey Hainsfurther said.

Blank is now 4-0 on the season in five starts with a 0.81 ERA. Batters are only hitting .130 against him this season.

"I got in the groove and started throwing strikes and letting the defense work. That's what happens," Blank said.

Baylor closed out the Classic with another loss to the Lamar Cardinals. Lamar was able to jump out to an early lead again, recording five runs, two on a home run to right field by catcher Thomas Henk.

"They were swinging the bat. They swung the bat good," Smith said. "The first inning [had] a lot of parts ... that bothered me in terms of how it was going about. But really if we just play the game the rest of the way, we come back."

The Bears were able to claw their way back from a 6-0 hole after the top of the first. Trailing 8-7 in the bottom of the ninth inning with the winning run on first base, junior center fielder Logan Vick struck out looking.

Freshman right-fielder Michael Howard only played in the final two games of the weekend but was 4 of 6, scored three runs, drew two walks and had three RBIs.

The Bears take on TCU at 6:30 p.m. today in Forth Worth.

Trial begins for nurse charged with capital murder

By MICHAEL GRACZYK
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUFKIN — An East Texas nurse violated the trust of a noble profession when she injected kidney dialysis patients with toxic bleach, killing five of them and injuring five others, a prosecutor said as the woman’s murder trial began Monday.

Kimberly Saenz, 38, faces a possible death sentence if convicted of capital murder in the April 2008 deaths.

Saenz stood in court holding her hands behind her back as Angelina County District Attorney Clyde Herrington read the six-count indictment against her.

Her lawyer, Ryan Deaton, answered “Not guilty, your honor,” on her behalf when the judge asked for a plea after each count.

Herrington told jurors in his opening remarks that evidence would show there was bleach in the IV dialysis lines of victims who were being treated at a DaVita dialysis clinic in Lufkin, about 125 miles northeast of Houston.

“The defendant in this case is the one that put it there,” he said.

He said investigators also found Internet searches on Saenz’s computer about bleach poisoning in blood and whether bleach could be detected in dialysis lines.

“The profession of nursing is one of the most respected,” Herrington told jurors. “Health care providers devote their career to those who are sick and ill ... But involves a great deal of trust. And if that trust is violated, very serious things can happen.”

Saenz was charged a year after the Lufkin clinic closed for about two months following a rash of illnesses and deaths.

Emergency crews had been called to the clinic many as 30 times that April, including seven for cardiac problems, and made at least 19 runs. Four people had died.

There had been only two calls during the previous 15 months, according to the Texas Department of Health Services.

Denver-based health care giant DaVita Inc. investigated along with local, state and federal agencies.

Inspectors were present on April 28, 2008, when two dialysis patients said they suddenly didn’t feel well and two others reported that they saw Saenz inject bleach into tubing used by two fellow patients.

Saenz, who had held her entry-level position as a licensed vocational nurse for eight months, was sent home. Police were summoned.

Saenz

The next day she was fired.

In his opening defense statement, Deaton said the stories told by the two patients who complained about Saenz varied widely and said DaVita officials waited eight hours before calling police.

“DaVita Inc. is the puppet master in this case,” he said, drawing an immediate objection from Herrington that was upheld by the judge.

But he continued to blame the company, insisting DaVita “has manipulated the evidence ... and the science in this case.”

Deaton said he would present evidence to contradict the charges.

For example, a syringe patients saw Saenz using was being used to measure bleach for a cleaning solution so Saenz could get the precise amount and adhere to clinic rules, he said.

“When Kim supposedly is doing this, there’s a monitor watching her, there’s people in the clinic,” Deaton said. “Patients are watching what’s going on.”

“Everybody’s freaking out,” he continued. “People were dying. Everybody’s on edge. This whole thing is just a firecracker.”

Federal investigators examined blood tubing, IV bags and syringes used by the DaVita patients, who spent up to three days a week tethered for hours to a machine that filtered their blood — a job their kidneys could no longer do.

Joel Sprott, an attorney for clinic operator DaVita Inc., has said the Denver-based company turned over more than 10,000 pages of records in the case.

Through 2011, DaVita operated or provided services to 1,809 dialysis facilities in the U.S., serving some 142,000 patients and employing more than 41,000 people.

Citing a gag order imposed by the judge, DaVita spokesman Vince Hancock would only say last week only that the company looks forward “to continuing our steadfast commitment to the Lufkin community.”

A Food and Drug Administration report found some samples linked to some victims tested positive for bleach while others showed bleach “may have been present at one time.”

Clinic policy calls for bleach to be used in various concentrations for cleaning and then chemical reactive agents are used to confirm bleach residue was removed and the cleaned areas are safe. “The point is, bleach is used in every aspect of dialysis,” Deaton said.

riers in the neighborhood, she said.

Scales said she bought the fore-closed house from the bank in February 2011 with a vision of revitalizing the historical movement of settlement houses.

“We are bringing to life our roots of the social work profession,” Scales said.

Unable to work inside the house yet because of the severe state of disrepair, the volunteers focused their attention on the outside of the house Saturday afternoon. Scales said Good Neighbor Settlement House needs skilled labor volunteers such as plumbers, electricians, architects and structural engineers and more funds to repair the house.

Once this work is done and the city of Waco declares the house occupiable, work can begin inside the house to make it a place for the community.

Once the house is repaired, Scales said ideally two graduate students would move into the upstairs apartment and help orchestrate the community involvement with the house.

Students interested in living in the house can go to www.good-neighborwaco.com. They can express their interest by sending an email to graduate student Morgan Caruthers, who is the president of the Good Neighbor board. Applicants will be interviewed by the Good Neighbor board. The living arrangements would be for the fall. If work on the house is finished in time.

Once the house is open, Baylor-coordinated programming by the live-in students would be kept to a minimum to give the neighborhood a chance to establish its own interests, such as book clubs, cooking demonstrations, gardening and other activities, Scales said.

This would promote a closer community, she said.

In addition, she said her greater vision for the neighborhood would be to have other students move into houses in the neighborhood to increase student participation in the community.

Dr. Tanya Brice, professor of social work, said all of these activities are what the historical settlers, or people in the settlement house community, participated in.

Brice said the house was originally a daycare that operated for about 60 years.

“Not only is the house going to be a part of the tradition of settlement houses, but it also has a history of its own,” Brice said.

Brice also said having university students involved is “an important key of staying close to the methodology of settlement houses.”

Brice and Scales agreed student volunteers and student involvement is essential to bringing the settlement house to life.

Houston sophomore Lanre Aboderin, a member of the BIC program, volunteered at the house Saturday and on Martin Luther King Service Day on Jan. 17.

“It [the settlement house] is a really great vision if it all comes together,” he said. “Any place where people can come together and actually get to know one another, break social norms and break stereotypes is good.”

Aboderin said volunteering at the house and the idea of the settlement is a good representation of how Baylor can function as a community of neighbors capable of helping others.

El Paso sophomore Victoria Morgan agreed with Aboderin.

“People are always talking about getting outside of the Baylor Bubble and this seemed like a really great way to do it, especially because they have Baylor students living in the house,” Morgan said.

Dr. Amy Antoninka, BIC professor, said students can learn the benefits of volunteering during their experience working at the house and in the community.

“Having students here [at the house] on a recurring basis makes them recognize that neighborhoods and neighbors are crucial in their life, whether they stay in Waco or not,” Antoninka said.

Scales said the teaching opportunity of the experience extends beyond working at the house.

The settlement house experience will be incorporated into social work classes in the fall, by having students write proposals to neighborhood boards for projects like the settlement house or other community involvement ideas.

She said the proposals will show students how to gather support from the community, a process that is essential to making a settlement house successful because it is based on the combined efforts of students and neighbors.

Brice said students could see how the settlement house comes to life and what resources are involved in that process, as well as become engaged in the community.

vulnerable to falling prey to sex trafficking.

The vulnerable include, but are not limited to, victims of childhood sexual abuse, runaways and homeless youth, Smyer said.

The average age of those entering prostitution in America is 13.5 years old, Smyer said, but anyone engaging in prostitution, pornography or stripping under the age of 18 is legally considered a “trafficked” individual.

To bring the issue closer to home, Smyer said one-quarter of trafficked victims in the U.S. end up in Texas at some point, and 74 percent of the prostitution and porn industry in Texas is composed of trafficked victims. Peters then shared a story to open attendees’ eyes to the reality of sex trafficking in Waco.

“Just a few weeks ago, my brother-in-law was approached by a young woman on 17th Street at a food place,” Peters said. “She seemed drugged and asked if he would jump her car because the battery was dead. As he went outside, a man in her car told him the girl was ‘for rent.’ He is a trafficker.” Under federal law, a trafficker is anyone willing to exploit another human being for profit, Peters said.

Though sex trafficking is a dark subject, Peters said she has high hopes for Christians who “face the darkness head-on.”

“We too will glow with God’s presence and penetrate and demolish this dark industry in our day,” Peters said.

UnBound is developing an unofficial college task force with 12 students already committing to raise awareness and host events at Baylor. The task force held its first unofficial meeting last week.

Dallas junior Natalie Garnett is a member of the college task force and said she enjoyed meeting with the developing group of Baylor students last week. “Finally, there’s this unified movement we can jump into and bring all our ideas together, use them and make them happen,” Garnett said.

Garnett said UnBound presents Baylor students unique opportunities to get involved in fighting sex trafficking in the Waco community.

“We’re living in Waco and there’s trafficking around us,” Garnett said. “We’re living in a place where trafficking is happening, and that’s not o-kay.”

UnBound plans to hold quarterly meetings. Those interested can send an email to unboundwaco@gmail.com or follow the organization on Twitter @UnBound_Antioch. Smyer also encouraged people to keep their eyes open and report suspicious activity to the trafficking hotline at 1-888-373-7888.

ful things,” Barbara Bush said.

Laura Bush, who restored the Lincoln bedroom, said that while at the White House, she thought a lot about other presidencies.

“You think of all the challenges that other presidents faced and that our country faced and how we overcame all of those challenges,” she said.

“You live with these effects of all the people who lived there before you,” she said. “You live with their decorating. You live with their taste. Their choice in furniture or china or decorative arts.”

Bush’s presidential center is set to open in spring 2013.

player eventually triumphs,” Shafer said. “Suspense is an important predictor of the enjoyment of both audiovisual media (like TV and movies) and interactive media like video games.”

‘Mass Effect 2’, along with other predecessors designed by BioWare, has some negative aspects, such as repetitiveness in the layouts of maps — something Mass Effect

3 is expected to have resolved, Behren said.

“I’m expecting it to be a powerful conclusion to the Mass Effect trilogy,” Behren said.

“I think ‘Mass Effect 3’ will be the most anticipated game of 2012, but there is a lot of competition.”

Also released today is the N7 Collector’s Edition of ‘Mass Effect 3’, which offers bonus in-game items along with the standard options and other collectible items.

“With ‘Mass Effect 3’, we are delivering blockbuster action and heart-wrenching emotion on a scale that far exceeds anything we’ve ever done before,” Hudson said.

The game sells for $59.99 before tax on PC, Playstation 3 and Xbox 360.

featured at a similar event last year at the George Bush Presidential Library and Museum in College Station.

“Not every place has a living first lady,” said McBride, now an executive-in-residence at the school of public affairs at American University in Washington. “The idea is to take components of the program to match the interests of the libraries.”

After Barbara Bush’s comments on the current political season, Laura Bush talked about seeing cartoons critical of Abraham Lincoln, and commented, “You realize it is just kind of part of American politics.”

“You’re much kinder than I am,” Barbara Bush said. “I think the rest of the world is looking at us and thinking, ‘What are you doing? Why aren’t you getting along?’”

The Bushes mainly talked about life in the White House, with Barbara Bush recalling a special fondness for her office.

“I loved my little office because it was — besides being Nancy Reagan’s beauty parlor, which she didn’t like me to say, but it was — the dogs were born here and you could look out the window at Jackson Place and Lafayette Square and you could see all sorts of wonder-
