Answers to Your Many Financial Questions

How would you define being financially literate? What does that mean to you?

What are some common misconceptions about managing money for college students?

Tell me about some of the most common mistakes you see when students are managing their finances.

What are some truths about financial management that you wish more students knew?

The credit card is a gift, not a tool you're using to audit the book you're using.

The amount you spend is the same, even if it's not the amount you spend on the book you're auditing.

My GPA is in my mind, not in my pocket.

I can always track my spending, in my head. But there's no point in doing that.

The credit card is like the spreadsheet in my brain.

The amount you spend is the same, even if it's not the amount you spend on the book you're auditing.

I can always track my spending, in my head. But there's no point in doing that.

The credit card is like the spreadsheet in my brain.

The amount you spend is the same, even if it's not the amount you spend on the book you're auditing.

I can always track my spending, in my head. But there's no point in doing that.

The credit card is like the spreadsheet in my brain.

The amount you spend is the same, even if it's not the amount you spend on the book you're auditing.

I can always track my spending, in my head. But there's no point in doing that.