Reaching a fork in the road

The year has started and a crossroads has been reached.

I really do hope that all the newcomers to Brooks Residential College have enjoyed themselves so far and continue to do so. There are many events coming up throughout the year that I’m sure you will enjoy!

For me, the year has started and I feel less sure of where I’m going in life than when I started as a freshman last year.

I feel as if I have come to a crossroads over majors and academic endeavors for the future. I also feel as though I might want to do something different with my life that I never planned on doing, and never even thought would cross my mind.

Who am I?

This is a very vague question, and one that we often defer pondering; maybe it just takes too much time, or too much effort. In reality, though, this is one of the most important questions that we could possibly ask ourselves, especially we freshmen who find our lives transitioning before our very eyes in ways too many to count.

When we ask ourselves who we are, maybe we should consider answering according to who we are right now, at this moment, rather than trying to put together the pieces of our amalgamative lives as a whole. I’m not saying that we should ignore our past experiences, but rather that to better answer the question “Who am I?” about ourselves, it will serve us much better to view our present situation as a culmination of those experiences.

Think of it this way: if a person were to ask us how we were doing today, would we then tell them how we were doing, or would we instead explain to them all of the various factors that decided how we were doing? The same is true when asking ourselves who we are. Whether we consider our life experiences or not, the result is still the
When I came to Baylor, I was set on a certain career path, and “that was that,” as the saying goes. Now, though, I realize that I might want to explore different tracks in life. I’m definitely not giving up on the most basic principle that I came to Baylor for (my Bachelor’s degree), but I’m not sure about certain things that I was sure about doing before.

During my talks with others about my change of mind, I have had some mixed responses. Some question why I would want to change my major, and usually respond with “stick with it.” Since those responses, I have talked with advisors, professors, graduates and students, and have come to realize that a change in mind is not something that should be seen as “giving up.”

Exploration is a key part of living and experiencing everything the world has to offer, and that is what I hope I can express to you while you are reading this.

While some of you are probably not at these crossroads, I hope that you can take into consideration the fact that changing your mind should be embraced and even seen as God’s gift to you.

For those of you that are in the same boat, don’t be discouraged in the seemingly grueling process that you must endure, but embrace the change, explore your options and welcome God’s voice into your life as he tries to lead you to where He sees that you best fit.

I hope everybody has fantastic weeks ahead!

Welcome—and welcome back—to all of the members of Brooks College.

Having our collegiate society gathered together once more gladdens my soul and quickens my step—though little Zachary often has me moving quickly these days as he scurries to and fro around the college.

Why do I find myself so delighted to be together with you again?

Here’s one way of describing matters.

Both within and beyond the walls of our college we constitute a community full of potential for lasting and meaningful friendships; for the alternately quiet and boisterous occasions of joy-filled, mutual presence to and for each other; for open-ended, soul-searching conversations about God’s call and the Lord’s will, as well as clear and confident testimony regarding divinely ordered truth, beauty, and goodness; for ready help in bearing burdens too heavy to be borne alone; for developing the self-understanding in community that is requisite for wisdom; and for enjoying alongside worthy companions the essential collegiate experiences of feasting, learning, praying, celebrating, living, hoping, and being together.

For such reasons as these, let me say it again—welcome into Brooks College!
same, and the question is much more answerable when viewed in this way.

That being said, my name is Matthew Carrington. I’m a freshman here at Baylor University and a member of Brooks College. I’m taking many of the same classes that you are. I’m generally a quick thinker (as long as there aren’t numbers involved), but I often refrain from saying what I think immediately, though I’m not sure why. I guess this is a little passive aggressive of me, but it usually serves me well.

My major is English, and I love to write (although the planets have to be aligned and the moon full and the temperature just right before my fleeting mind is bestowed with enough patience and inspiration to actually turn an idea into written word).

I’d like to think of myself as outgoing and I never pass up hearing a good joke, although I’m rather introverted a lot of the time. I love to read classic science fiction novels (or any science fiction for that matter) by great authors such as Isaac Asimov, H.G. Wells, Ray Bradbury, and Robert Heinlein. I’m not sure what else....

Oh yeah. My relationship with Christ is the most important part of my life. I am just as much a sinner as the next person, but I strive to be Christ-like in every area of my life just as he commands so that I can encourage others and even become the means by which Christ will save some of the lost. I think that sums up who I am at the moment at least adequately.

Alas, I must admit that I’m a Yankee by birth; if it’s any consolation to you native Texans, I’ve lived here for nearly eight years, and before that I was raised on brisket that was fixed by my native-Texan mother.

Anyway, I moved to Longview, Texas about eight years ago. I had lived in a suburb of Cincinnati, Ohio called Westchester for eleven years. My dad worked at General Electric there in the aircraft engines manufacturing section of the plant as a structural engineer.

When 9/11 hit, productivity in the plant was all but stalled, and G.E. was forced to lay off a couple thousand employees. After twenty two years at G.E., my dad was laid off. He searched for a job locally for a while, but after minimal success he decided that he’d look into openings near Fort Worth, where my mother’s parents lived. Sure enough, he found a job in Longview, Texas, a place we had never heard of.

It was only after he flew down for the interview that he discovered that it was three hours away from Fort Worth; nonetheless, everything worked out, and the rest of the family flew down shortly. Ever since then I’ve worked on becoming a true Texan as best I could. I’m so thankful that God brought my family to Texas (and not just because of Chuck Norris and brisket).

Assuredly, I wasn’t very happy about the transition to begin with, but just as God promises, he works all things for the good of those who love Him, and that’s exactly what He did. He brought my family to a God-fearing, Christ-centered church where my younger brother and I could learn and grow, and where my parents could find support and wisdom. And now He’s brought me here, to Baylor, where I expect the same kind of learning and growing to take place.
Life as music

Did you ever take piano lessons, or have you ever listened to a child who is learning to play? I personally never made it past the beginner’s stage... but I have noticed there is a certain “choppy” quality to a beginner’s piece compared to the lovely flowing rhythm of an experienced musician.

The way to move past the choppy delivery of notes to the beautiful art of playing music is not to toss your “Mary Had a Little Lamb” sheet music and start banging away at the keys in whatever order and speed you choose. The answer is to keep diligently practicing the basic rhythms until your muscle memory develops and is able to carry you past the elementary into something truly grand.

The ancient church fathers knew a little something about muscle memory. They talk of spiritual practices—practices that form a basic rhythm for life—and if we will hold onto the basic rhythm, eventually the rhythm takes hold of us... and our very lives become music.

It is popular to talk about spiritual growth as the work of grace—which it most certainly is. But it seems to be common sense that you and I are more likely to be moved and transformed by grace when we are, for example, reciting the Lord’s Prayer than when we’re playing Halo. Thus the church suggests that we engage in regular practices by which we make ourselves available to grace—yearly rhythms such as celebrating Easter, weekly rhythms such as observing Sabbath and daily rhythms such as prayer. These are only a few of the necessary notes of the Christian song.

While relying on grace does mean we can let go of legalism, it does not mean we can let go of rhythm. You and I cannot simply pound away on the keys of life without thought to what order or speed we use or which notes we hit. Without a certain rhythm, our spiritual work resembles clanging and cacophony. We cover our own ears, cowering in a corner, cringing at the sound of our shortcomings. We expect character to befall us without the content of discipline, and we are drastically disappointed time and again. God’s grace does not mean, “play however you want.” The right notes in the right order with the right timing are still important.

When we do make attempts at spiritual disciplines, sometimes it feels wooden and artificial at first, much like our first endeavors at playing “Mary Had a Little Lamb.” The solution is the same as it was back on that piano bench: Keep diligently practicing the basic rhythms until your muscle memory develops and is able to carry you past the elementary into something truly grand.

And that is the function of morning and evening prayer at Brooks. The church has observed fixed-hour prayer throughout history—in part because the rhythmic worship of set-hour prayer is a musical offering to the ear of God and in part because the rhythm in which we engage in turn shapes us. It creates music in us and out of us and around us.

CL Spotlight:

Elisha Alvarado

Floor: 3K

Year: Junior

Home: San Antonio, TX

(Say-town: Home of the Alamo- Remember it!)

Major: Communication Science Disorders, Speech Pathology concentration; History Minor.

Activities:

I am a BICer and act as the Social/Service chair for NSSLHA (National Student Speech Language Hearing Association). Also, I pretty much dedicate most of my time to this one organization- it is called Brooks College.

Likes: I like to laugh uncontrollably.

Dislikes: I dislike sleep deprivation.

Fun Facts:

Two different people have created Facebook videos of me laughing- yes, that is all I am doing during the videos. Apparently my laugh amuses people. I have an eleven year old brother- he is a ninja. My older sister met her fiancé because I invited her to the Brooks May Ball. I get really invested into movies, so watching a video with me could be interesting. I’ve been to Spain, Italy, France, and Ecuador (I like to travel and hope to travel more). I am taking ASL (American Sign Language), and I can phonetically transcribe your name if you wish.

Purpose as a CL:

My purpose as a CL is to serve. I am given the opportunity to serve everyday and the choice to wake up each day and venture to be a better servant of God. I want my residents to know that I am here to listen to and support them.

Dreams and Ambitions:

Well, life after Baylor involves Graduate school…. I hope it’s Vanderbilt….

Why did you choose Brooks?:

I did not choose Brooks, Brooks chose me. I am thoroughly grateful for the opportunity to be part of this community. My Baylor experience would not have been as amazing without my involvement in Brooks College. I choose to continue living here because I believe in the power of the idea that Brooks stands for - a group of people dedicated to charity, embracing the responsibilities of life together, offering service without expectation of return, and remaining loyal amidst difficulty. The relationships that are created within these walls are most dear to me - I love my Brooks family very much.

What is one of the best parts of the CL experience?:

The growth I receive from both the challenges and joyful experiences that result from this position.

Hi, Brooksters, I’m Anson Jablinski, a first-year senior (victory lap ahead!) majoring in Music Education. I’ll be writing this column all year to let you know about all the cool concerts and shows featuring Baylor students that you can attend.

The School of Music has at least 15 major performing ensembles, and then there’s Baylor Theater, the Martin Museum of Art and more!

If you want an event to be in the Forecast, you can always e-mail me and let me know about it. If it’s a performance or exhibit featuring a Baylor student, I’ll include it—no matter who, what or where!!

If you’re in an ensemble (whether it’s one of Baylor’s or not), let me know, and whenever I write about one of your events, I’ll include your name so we can all support our fellow Brooks men and women!

Unless otherwise noted, all events are at 7:30 pm in Jones Concert Hall (in the McCravy Music Building) and totally free of charge.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 18
5 PM
Parents’ Weekend Choral Concert

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22
