

Eco-friendly baby steps can start with a fabric bag

Last Friday I went to the store to do my monthly grocery shopping, and I realized that the clerks never ask, “Paper or plastic?” anymore. Now it’s just plastic.

Paper bags are still available if you ask for them, but they’re no longer preferred because they’re not as environmentally friendly. The advantage to having paper bags is the durability they offer over plastic bags.

I’m sick of my plastic bags breaking and groceries going everywhere when I’m loading the car or walking into my apartment.

I don’t typically consider myself an eco-friendly person; I don’t go out of my way to do my part, even though I should.

Although I’ve done little things that I think will help the environment, such as not driving my car unless I have too, not wasting things or leaving lights on, I never really put forth a huge effort to be green.

I’ve finally begun to realize how wasteful I can really be.

I thought I was being practical by using the little plastic grocery bags as little trash bags for garbage cans and as storage, but in the end, I throw more bags away than I use.

point of view

BY ALEX MAXWELL

There is a solution to this bag dilemma that will help the environment.

Stores like H-E-B and Wal-Mart have offered reusable fabric bags to customers that are made of fabric and can be used over and over again.

A reusable bag would typically cost about a dollar. With that price, I think I could afford to get a handful of bags. I’ve realized that I could use them for many years to come. I go to the grocery store at least once a month, so if I used a reusable bag, I would only be spending an extra 8 cents a month.

I never thought that I would ever consider using a fabric bag because it didn’t seem like it would really make a difference.

I used to look at reusable bags and say to myself, “How goofy would I look lugging one of those around the store?”

I would almost go as far to say that it would emasculate me if I was seen with one. However, I now see the benefit of investing in a couple of fabric bags.

Using these bags will help improve the environment by reducing litter and landfill mass. The reusable bags also saves money for both the consumer and the retailer.

The Wall Street Journal reported in 2007 that the U.S. goes through 100 billion plastic shopping bags annually, which is estimated to cost retailers $4 billion.

Four billion dollars is a hefty chunk of change for any industry. That money could easily be spent elsewhere to improve my shopping experience.

Spending money on reusable bags is a small price to pay for what I’ll get in return: I would be helping the environment, saving the store money and preventing any of my groceries from ripping through the flimsy plastic bags.

According to the EPA, each plastic bag can take up to 1000 years to decompose.

Polluting the environment for that long is not something in which I want a part.

Artists have the right to take risks

“Art is what you can get away with,” said famed American artist Andy Warhol. Whether you agree with him or not, you’ve got to admit, he may be on to something.

Earlier this month, American artist Jeff Koons’s retrospective exhibition opened at the Palace of Versailles, causing quite a stir. Not all people were thrilled to see Koons’s works displayed throughout the former palace and gardens of French royalty.

His exhibition has once again caused some to ponder the definition of art, and whether there should be criteria that a creation must meet in order to earn the right to be called art.

Is Koons’s exhibition, which features 17 pieces of work, including a Clifford-size magenta “Balloon Dog,” an aluminum red lobster, and a glass case of vacuum cleaners and fluorescent lights, art? The National Union of Writers of France, a group dedicated to artistic purity, didn’t think so. The group held a protest outside the palace on opening day.

The exhibition “strikes at the heart of civilization,” the group’s chairman, Arnaud-Aaron Upinsky, told The New York Times. He also said the exhibition is “an outrage to Marie Antoinette.”

A tourist from Tokyo echoed Upinsky’s discontent for Koons’s work. “There’s so much nice modern art in the world. Why this?” she said to the Times.

It’s understandable that not all people can appreciate Koons’s work, but to say that an oversize balloon dog strikes at the heart of civilization may be stretching it a little. And when did this admiration for Marie Antoinette develop?

What critics need to understand about art is that there will never be a satisfactory definition. Art, like beauty, is subjective. One man’s scribble is another man’s art.

Take a look at English artist Damien Hirst’s works. Hirst embellishes dead animals such as cows, sharks and zebras, which are preserved in formaldehyde, with metals such as gold and silver, and displays them in glass boxes. Last week, 218 items of Hirst’s works were auctioned off, bringing in a record-breaking total of £111 million.

Some may say that his work is morbid, that it’s not art. But then again, think of taxidermy. Isn’t it just as morbid to stuff and mount a “hunting trophy” for display? Yet many people mount these animals on their living room walls just as they would a painting.

Artist Terence Koh also received attention for his exhibition of plaster figures, because all are depicted in a state of excitement. It was reported last week that his collection, and one figurine in particular depicting Christ, put Britain’s Baltic Centre for Contemporary Art in court, sued for outraging public decency.

It seems as if much of art today has to have some kind of shock value to garner attention, and that’s certainly true of the artists mentioned above. Sometimes it seems like a competition for who can go farthest. But just because it’s shocking doesn’t mean it’s not art. Art isn’t always aesthetically pleasing or non-offensive. Art pushes boundaries. It always has.

Did you think Renaissance writers, painters and sculptors were being safe when they led the cultural movement out of the Dark Ages?

Not all new ideas are readily accepted. Some things just take time. Impressionist art wasn’t always appreciated, but walk through any notable museum today, and you’ll see that some of the most valued pieces of art are the ones painted by van Gogh and Monet.

It’s not to say that something has to be shocking to be art. Sometimes people toss art around labeling something “art” just to make it credible. At the same time, art doesn’t have to be nice and safe. It’s improbable to have an objective standard because creativity and imagination have no limit and therefore aren’t things that can be placed in a narrow box.

If artists can’t take risks, where does that leave art? Where does it leave us?

Obama succeeds at not letting race define and confine his run

Last year, Sen. Joe Biden made a comment some people considered racially insensitive toward Sen. Barack Obama. Obama’s response was a mild one — he called Biden’s remark “historically inaccurate.”

This earned him a harsh rebuke from one of my readers. Obama, this gentleman told me via e-mail, had just lost his vote by acting like Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton, i.e., an angry black man. “Up to now,” the reader wrote, “I did not see him as an Afro American.”

Which brings us to our question for the day: What does black mean?

By now, I suspect Obama sees black as the horror movie monster who returns to life (string music shrieking) after the hero has seemingly killed it and turned to walk away. Can you blame him?

In the last 20 months, we’ve had the “Is he black enough?” controversy and the crazy preacher controversy, we’ve had Bob Johnson going off his meds, we’ve had Geraldine Ferraro calling Obama an affirmative action candidate, Rep. Lynn Westmoreland calling him “uppity” and Rep. Geoff Davis calling him “boy.” Lately, I’ve heard some African-Americans — including Obama supporters — griping at the notion that voting for him is their racial duty.

Now there’s a new poll by The Associated Press, Yahoo News and Stanford University, which

point of view

BY LEONARD PITTS

finds that a third of white Democrats have “deep-seated racial misgivings.” Given a choice of negative adjectives — lazy, boastful, violent — and asked whether they applied to African-Americans, significant minorities of whites said one or another of them did.

Apparently, then, “deep-seated racial misgivings” is the AP’s preferred euphemism for racism.

It’s worth noting, however, that larger numbers of whites imputed positive descriptions (good neighbors, determined to succeed) to blacks. And God bless the very canny 5 percent who refused altogether to play the sucker’s game of trying to describe 36 million people in one or two words, whether positive or negative.

Still, at day’s end, there remain those “deep-seated racial misgivings.” So when we ask what black means, well, pollsters say it may mean as many as six percentage points in lost votes for Obama.

This is the tightrope African-American politicians have walked since Tom Bradley ran for mayor of Los Angeles, if not before, trying to be black without being BLACK, as in that angry bogeyman that haunts white America’s dreams. At one level, it’s only smart politics: who’d want to vote for anyone who ran on a platform of grievance?

At another level, though, it is something else: recognition that there is a reflexive white fear of black claims upon conscience. As in my reader who insisted he had not previously seen Obama as black.

It’s a silly statement, but it made sense to him because to him, black means only grievance and anger seeking to burden his conscience. And he fears that enough that he processes even Obama’s mild chastisement as if the senator had become some fire-belching combination of Louis Farrakhan and Huey P.

Newton.

Obama has walked this tightrope about as well as anyone could, has answered racial questions when they have been unavoidable, but has striven not to be defined or confined by them, to make his candidacy about something other than his paint job and his culture. But race, the horror movie monster, is never quite slain and I suspect that Obama realizes this.

And realizes, too, that ultimately our question of the day is not his to answer.

What does black mean? We’ll find out in November.

Regent reflects on his history

By Prisca K. Anuolam
Reporter

Tommy Bowman, the first black athlete to attend Baylor on an athletic scholarship, spoke about “going the extra mile” at the Tribute to a Black Man Scholarship Award Ceremony Wednesday. The event in the Stacey Riddle Forum drew approximately 200 people.

“There are a lot of average people that only go one mile. The second-milers are the people who make a difference in life,” Bowman said.

Bowman, one of two athletes from Athens, Texas, played a role in the integration of the Southwest Conference athletic team.

In his speech to Baylor students, he referenced Mathew 5:41: “If someone forces you to go one mile, go with him two miles.”

In 1965, Bowman was recruited to play basketball at Baylor. He said he was very “country and naïve” at the time.

“I knew the black population was zero and I never considered myself a pioneer,” he said. “I was afraid that I might fail.”

He referenced Bible verses on courage.

“God’s divine intervention got me here,” he said.

Sarah Morris/Lariat staff

Tommy Bowman, a Baylor University alumnus and former Baylor basketball player, speaks Wednesday at “Tribute to a Black Man.” Bowman was the first black Baylor student on an athletic scholarship and currently serves on the Board of Regents.

Encouraged by the fact that he made Baylor’s basketball team, he said he conquered his fears and committed to playing for the Bears.

“As I look around and back to spring 1966 when I enrolled at Baylor, the scene is quite different from 42 years ago,” Bowman said.

Bowman was the only black basketball player and one of the few black men on campus when he was a student at Baylor.

Bowman attributed his success at Baylor to the support of family members.

“My mom thought I could do anything” he said, “I wouldn’t have made it without the support of my family.”

Speaking about success, he refused to define it by money or wealth, but instead family. “No one on earth is more successful than I am,” he said.

Companies flock to Career Fair

By Jillian Henderson and Kirsten Johnson

Hire-A-Bear Career Fair, sponsored by Career Services, will be held today from 12:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. in the Ferrell Center.

Students will have the opportunity to speak with representatives from over 130 different companies located across the U.S.

Each of these companies had to pay an entrance fee to be included in the career fair, so they have a vested interest to be there.

“It’s a little bit of everything, that’s why we advertise it campus wide,” said Carolyn Muska, associate director of Career Services.

Students should take a look at the list of companies participating in the career fair, located online on the Career Services Web site, Muska said. All participating organizations are listed with information about their companies.

Some of the companies that students can expect to see include the FBI, Conoco Phillips, Dillard’s, ExxonMobil, H-E-B, and many other well-known organizations.

“It may be a little overwhelming at first for those who haven’t been there before, but it is a great opportunity to become comfortable in communicating with business employers,” said Nicole McAninch, Career Services adviser.

McAninch said she also encourages students to go online and research company profiles.

Baylor press establishes niche

By Ashley Corinne Killough
Staff Writer

In the words of Dr. Don Schmeltekopf, Baylor University Press publishing one to two books per year was “virtually nonexistent” just a decade ago. Now, turning out 30 to 35 new titles annually, the press is splashing the Baylor name across academic circles worldwide.

Schmeltekopf, former provost for academic affairs and current director of the Center for Ministry Effectiveness and Educational Leadership, credits this sharp turn-around to the visionary plan of Dr. Carey Newman, director of Baylor University Press.

Newman was named director of church relations at Baylor in 2002 and was appointed director of the university’s press in 2003.

“He laid out his mission for us. He sold it, and we bought it,” Schmeltekopf said, metaphorically.

With annual revenues increasing from $20,000 to half a million dollars in six years, Newman’s leadership has ushered in exponential growth.

Prior to Newman’s arrival, the content of Baylor Press publications tended to be of local interest and lacked national significance, Schmeltekopf said.

By refocusing the press around religion and public life, Baylor Press did what any successful media outlet has done – it established a niche. With the intention of integrating faith and understanding, the books printed at the press touch on a variety of topics, like religion and politics, law and religion, and religion and history.

“Our goal is to be stewards of intelligent discussion on religion and culture,” Newman said. Since Newman started as director, Newman has brought in a larger staff and worked with a 12-member faculty committee to review book proposals and manuscripts.

“The university has really stood behind me,” Newman said. Established in 1897, Newman said Baylor Press is one of the oldest university presses in North America. The beginning of its 111-year history was marked with distinction, Newman said, noting the 1919 printing of Grove Samuel Dow’s “Introduction to the Principles of Sociology,” a prestigious textbook still used today.

Production slowed during the middle of the century, picking up again slightly in the 1970s. But Baylor Press has seen its most active output in the last six years, with several titles and authors garnering international attention.

The press will publish 19 new releases this fall. Some noteworthy titles include Rodney Stark’s “What Americans Really Believe,” a 40-year follow-up of his original study of American religious beliefs. Stark is a distinguished professor of the social sciences and co-director of Baylor’s Institute for Studies and Religion.

Dr. Rowan Williams, the Archbishop of Canterbury, is also publishing his book, “Dostoevsky: Language, Faith and Fiction,” through Baylor Press. Williams explores four of Dostoevsky’s major novels, comparing the iconic author’s writing style with his religious beliefs. “It’s the No. 2 guy in Christianity writing on the No. 1 guy in Russian literature,” Newman said, who will attend a launch party for the book in London next week.

Baylor Press will release “No Enemy to Conquer: Forgiveness in an Unforgiving World,” by Michael Henderson in the spring. With a foreword by the Dalai Lama, “No Enemy” is a book that presents commentary on reconciliation by world-renowned figures like Archbishop Tutu, Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks and Benazir Bhutto.

Dr. Bruce Longenecker, senior lecturer in New Testament at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland, published a book titled, “Rhetoric at the Boundaries,” with Baylor Press in 2005. “Through Newman’s guidance, this book was strengthened in a lot of ways,” Longenecker said. “I don’t think I would have come to Baylor Press if he wasn’t the director.”

Newman said he gets between 150 and 400 book proposals a year. If a proposal is chosen, the manuscript undergoes a blind peer review.

“This is an essential feature of a university press, because it ensures the quality of a publication,” Newman said.

To add value to a book, Newman said he reads the manuscript three to four times and works intensively with the author to ensure a book’s continuity and effectiveness.

“You get to be part of the author’s career,” Newman said. “A book is just an excuse to build a relationship with an author.”

Baylor Press has already planned its booklist for the Fall 2009 and Spring 2010 seasons and is currently working on Fall 2010 and Spring 2011.

Mid-Autumn Moon Fest to showcase Vietnamese traditions, culture, food

By Janna Quinn
Reporter

Students and faculty have the opportunity to celebrate one of the most popular festivals in Vietnam, Tet Trung Thu.

The festival is celebrated when the moon appears larger than any other time of the year.

The 16th Annual Mid-Autumn Moon Festival, sponsored by the Vietnamese Student Association, will bring Vietnamese food, martial arts and cultural dancing to Baylor at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Barfield Drawing Room.

The Festival is an ancient Vietnamese tradition that revolves around children.

Traditionally, the festival was a way for parents in Vietnam to spend time with their children after the harvest season.

In Vietnam, the festival is in the eighth lunar month of the year.

"We want people to come to expand their culture, to let so there will be some songs that people will recognize," Tan said.

Members of J.K. Wong Academy from Richardson will demonstrate martial arts.

They also specialize in lion and dragon dancing. The dragon and lion symbolize strength and luck in Asian cultures.

The Academy will dance to the beat of drums with paper-mâché lion heads infused with fur to symbolize the mythological creatures.

On the night of festival in Vietnam, children form a procession and walk through the street holding lanterns.

"We're trying to re-enact how it is in Vietnam, over here," Kim Nguyen said. "At the end of the event, attendees will receive colored lanterns and will follow the dragon and lion dancers to Fifth Street."

Diane Nguyen said the VSA has been working hard to put the show together.

"I just want (Baylor) to know a little bit of what our food is like and where we come from," she said.

Guests will also have a chance to experience Vietnamese singing, traditional dances and a slideshow of pictures from last year's event.

"I hope they will come away with a sense of appreciation for other cultures, as well as saying, 'Hey, I learned something new,'" Kim Nguyen said.

It's important to purchase tickets early. The festival is a popular event with limited room, Tan said.

"We had so many people last year that we had to cut off ticket sales before the festival," he said.

VSA sold 230 tickets last year, and more showed up at the door just wanting to watch the show, Tan said.

Kim Nguyen said old members and faculty come out the festival every year to support them.

"We have the Festival so students can get out and see what's on Baylor campus and diversify themselves," Kim Nguyen said. "I hope they take the opportunity to do that."

Tickets are $10 before the event and $12 at the door. They are available in Baylor Sciences Building and the ticket office at the Bill Daniel Student Center.

Members of the Vietnamese Student Association perform in the fashion show wearing traditional dress at last year's Mid-Autumn Moon Festival.

everyone know there is a VSA on campus, and to let them know how we eat and how we dress," said Houston sophomore Diane Nguyen, VSA service chair.

At the event, guests can enjoy a six-course authentic Vietnamese meal prepared by the members' parents.

The menu includes egg rolls, Vietnamese salad (Gỏi), soup, fried rice, noodles and a dessert with fruit, said Sugar Land sophomore and VSA president Stephen Tan.

Members will model different styles of Áo Dài or "long dress" in a fashion show during the event.

"Each Asian culture has a different style of dress," said Houston junior and VSA vice president Kim Nguyen. "For example, Japanese has kimono. We have Áo Dài."

Vietnamese music will play throughout the event, but American songs will also be in the mix.

"We do it like that every year thing that has no meaning."

Rogers' improvisation adds to her metaphorical lyrics and acoustic sound.

"I purposefully leave an entire verse blank and let it come out in the moment," she said. "You

Blues, folk-rock and pop unite in a concert where three local musicians will welcome back Green River Ordinance to Common Grounds.

Sarah Rogers, a local artist and Common Grounds employee, said Green River Ordinance is like a member of the Common Grounds family.

"They've played here a few times and they're really starting to get out there," Rogers said.

Scheduled to perform Thursday with friend Julie Bennet, Rogers said she is happy Common Grounds is becoming more like a music venue.

"It's like a tree house," Rogers said. "People come in and hang out. It's a place where bands can refresh themselves, because it's not forced. It feels natural."

Rogers said she considers herself more of a storyteller than a songwriter.

"I experience life, pick up a guitar and all of a sudden — a song is born," Rogers said. "It flows more naturally that way, rather than conjuring up some-never know what I'm going to sing because it's what I'm feeling or thinking right then."

Jackson Edwards is another local artist who is looking forward to playing, he said.

"We were in Canada for a two-week tour last summer and haven't played a show since," Edwards said. "We were looking to book a show and were excited that we found Common Grounds, since there's not a lot of local venues."

Edwards started playing guitar his junior year in college and said his main influence was the blues. He said artists like Bob Dylan, Stevie Ray Vaughan and Ryan Adams inspire him, because of their passion for music.

"I think I'm just looking for that connection with the audience — whether it's through a love song like 'Shiver,' which is kind of lovey-dovey, or a song about searching, like 'Making Strangers,'" he said.

Jill Mashburn, the owner of Common Grounds, said she is excited to have Green River Ordinance back along with Waco musicians.

Courtesy of Jackson Edwards

Jackson Edwards is one of the local artists opening for Green River Ordinance tonight at Commons Grounds.

"Green River Ordinance has been recording in Memphis, so it's really a treat to have them back in Texas," Mashburn said.

The rock band recorded its first extended single (EP) "Way Back Home," in the basement of their church and it sold out in just a few months.

"They're Capitol Recording artists who've been on stage with musicians from Sister Hazel to Simple Plan," Mashburn said. "They're a lot of fun to watch and they're working on a new album, so we're pumped to see what new stuff they have."

In addition to supporting live, original music, the concert is a way to support freedom of expression, Rogers said.

"I hope people come out to take a minute to listen to something new," Edwards said. "It's a release for me. It's where I can find ways to say 'I love you' or 'I am so angry' or 'I am so lost' in a better way than just uttering those sentences."

The concert will start at 8 p.m. tonight in Common Grounds' Backyard. Tickets are $8 and can be purchased at Common Grounds.

Breyfogle's spike gives BU win, 3-2

By Justin Baer
Reporter

As Baylor entered Wednesday night's contest against the University of Oklahoma, all of Baylor's 10 wins this season had come with relative ease. Win 11 was a little bit harder to come by, as the Sooners battled the Bears in five sets of a 25-18, 21-25, 25-21, 26-28, 15-13 Baylor victory at the Ferrell Center.

It is the first five-set victory for Baylor since Oct. 24, 2007, and the Bears 3-0 conference start is the first in school history, including when Baylor was in the Southwest Conference.

"We feel like we have got a special team," head coach Jim Barnes said. "We are still not near as good as we can be yet. We just need to keep getting better."

Although the Sooners out-blocked the Bears, Baylor dominated all other aspects of the match including digs — something Baylor was focusing on heading into the match.

"It was a defensive battle," Barnes said. "I told the ladies if we could out-dig them, which is a tall, tall order, we could come out with a victory."

Katie Sanders led the match with 21 kills and also added 21 digs. Meanwhile Anna Breyfogle contributed 19 kills, while Ashlie Christenson tacked on 15 kills.

The Bears came out striking, pounding the Sooners with .375 hitting in the first set. Baylor's impressive start jolted Sooner head coach Santiago Restrepo to receive a yellow card and red card in the first set.

After the Sooners bounced back to claim the second set 25-21, Ashlie Christenson paved the way for Baylor in the third set. Christenson dialed eight kills in the third set alone, to help her team capture the 25-21 set.

"I just played my game for the team," the Cleburne sophomore said. "I did my job so they could do theirs."

In the fifth set, Sanders, Christenson and Briana Tolbert opened up the set with kills to help Baylor jump on to a 4-2 lead. The Sooners scored on the first match point, but Breyfogle sent the Sooners packing on the next play.

"I really like pressure situations," Breyfogle said. "I don't know why. It's weird. I am so happy I could finish that for the team, though."

Baylor returns to the Ferrell Center against Kansas State University at 7 p.m. Saturday at the Ferrell Center.

Baylor fishing club claims fifth place

David Poe
Reporter

Baylor's bass fishing club competed last weekend at Lake Lewisville in the Collegiate Bass Fishing Championship, winning a total of $2,000 and making the finals.

The club sent a pair of two-man teams to the event. Waco junior Jay Holland and Tyler junior Chris Gass comprised one team, while Lorena senior Andrew McAdams and sophomore Ryan Thompson comprised the other.

The competition began Sept. 18, but the two Baylor teams began "pre-fishing" Sept. 15. "Pre-fishing" is where the teams fish to find good spots prior to the competition.

The Holland and Gass team entered Thursday in a humble 36th place, but by the end of the day the team climbed its way to third place with a combined catch of 22 pounds, the largest of the competition. The team also was awarded the Big Bass honor of the day.

"Jay and I both had the mindset that we wanted to go up there and win it," Gass said.

On Saturday, the team competed with four other universities including the University of Arkansas, Texas A&M University, Texas Tech University and Texas A&M University at Kingsville.

Holland and Gass finished the competition in fifth place and won $2,000.

"I look at it from the perspective that we're in the top five in the nation, and we had a lot of fun," Gass said.

The money awarded to the club hasn't yet been allocated, Gass said.

Holland believes that membership has been slow, since the club is unable to compete without having a boat, as boats are expensive. A newer, inexpensive bass fishing boat starts around $22,000.

The club also has experienced low membership because few know of its existence on campus.

"A lot of people here at Baylor are outdoors people, but about 90 percent don't know there is a fishing club," Gass said.

The Collegiate Bass Fishing Championship will be televised via tape-delay on Fox Sports Network at 7:00 p.m. Wednesday.

Soccer suits up for weekend matches against TSU, TAMU

By Joe Holloway
Sports Writer

The Baylor soccer team (4-4) will travel to San Marcos to take on Texas State University (3-3-2) at 7 p.m. Friday.

The match marks the Bears' first away game since they posted a 2-0 loss at the University of New Mexico August 29. The team's only other away game, against the University of Texas at El Paso, was also a loss. The Miners beat the Bears 1-0 on August 22.

Head coach Marci Jobson doesn't think the poor road record is indicative of how her team is going to play on Friday.

"I don't think as much about those statistical things," she said. "I really feel we need to go after Texas State. They're going to come after us."

Since those two road losses, the Bears have gone 4-2 at home, including a 10-1 scoring outburst against Prairie View A&M University and, most recently, a hard-fought 1-0 victory over a tough University of Houston team.

"I think every time you win, it builds your confidence," Jobson said. "But these girls know we're as good as our last game and we have a new game now."

Junior forward Katie White said the win at Houston showed the Bears' toughness.

"It was a battle and we came out on top so it shows that if we fight, we can win," she said.

Senior forward and midfielder Andi Fagan says the team is excited about the trip.

"I think we're kind of ready to prove ourselves out on the road like we've been trying to prove ourselves at home," she said.

The Bears won't be gone too long. Baylor returns to the friendly confines of the Betty Lou Mays Soccer Field to play host to Texas A&M University Sunday at 7 p.m., for its first conference action of the season.

speaking with Obama and before the two campaigns had hammered out a joint statement expressing that Congress should act urgently on the bailout.

And while McCain's campaign said he would "suspend" his campaign, it simply will move to Washington knowing the spotlight will remain on him no matter where he is.

Obama, too, made a political calculation by rejecting McCain's challenge while trying to still appear on top of the problem. Obama repeatedly stressed at his news conference that he called McCain first to propose that they issue a joint statement in support of a package to help fix the economy as soon as possible. He said McCain called back several hours later, as Obama was leaving a rally in Florida, and agreed to the idea of a statement but also said he wanted to postpone the debate and hold joint meetings in Washington. Obama said he suggested they first issue a joint statement showing bipartisanship.

"When I got back to the hotel, he had gone on television to announce what he was going to do," Obama said.

McCain said he would return to Washington after addressing former President Clinton's Global Initiative session in New York Thursday. He canceled his planned appearance Wednesday on CBS' "Late Show With David Letterman" program and a meeting with the prime minister of India.

McCain called Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to propose that joint meetings with Obama and congressional leadership be held quickly, according to leadership aides. Reid spokesman Jim Manley said Reid responded by reading McCain his public statement, in which he said it would not be helpful to have the candidates come back during negotiations and inject presidential politics.

The Commission on Presidential Debates and the University of Mississippi, the site of the forum, said they were moving forward with plans for the debate.

McCain's running mate, Sarah Palin, was canceling her limited campaign events. Palin said in an interview with CBS Evening News Wednesday that the country could be headed for another Great Depression if Congress doesn't reach a solution.

McCain adviser Steve Schmidt wouldn't say how long the suspension would last but indicated it would go through the weekend to reach agreement on a deal before the markets open Monday.

be the last of his presidency. The president hoped it would convince regular Americans of the bailout's relevance and, as Perino said, "get this over the goal line" with lawmakers.

White House and administration officials have warned repeatedly of what Perino on Wednesday called the risk of "financial calamity."

But that has not closed the deal, which for many recalls previous warnings of grave threats from Bush, such as before the Iraq war, that did not materialize. So Bush's goal with his speech was to frame the debate in layman's terms to show the depths of the crisis, explain how it affects the people's daily lives and inspire the public to demand action from Washington. He was not expected to dwell much on the question of blame.

"The cold on Wall Street could infect Main Street," Perino said. People "are concerned about their homes, their education funds, their retirement accounts, their savings."

The White House has struggled to determine how to deploy Bush.

As the problem mushroomed over the weekend of Sept. 13, Bush generally stayed out of the limelight, letting Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke take the lead with reporters, lawmakers and the public. Bush remained silent for days.

Since Thursday, however, the president has talked about the crisis almost daily, although usually briefly, and yet he still has had trouble breaking into the debate. News coverage has barely mentioned Bush's comments.

The decision to pull out perhaps a president's largest available weapon, the ability to demand a presence on evening television screens nationwide, from a setting with the ultimate bully-pulpit power, is one sign that the rescue package still faces daunting hurdles. TV executives can't be thrilled to give up airtime. This is the much-promoted week when the networks unveil their first episodes of the fall season for high-profile shows.

With so many crises hitting the United States at once, the presidential race has taken a back seat and so has Bush's involvement in politics. Wednesday's Florida trip was the third time in a week that he has scrapped his attendance at out-of-town fundraisers, either because of the market turmoil or Hurricane Ike.

The economic crisis also is almost certain to overshadow the rest of Bush's four months left in office and could hugely impact his legacy. It has been assumed that the long-term view of Bush's presidency was to be shaped largely by Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Now, the dire economic problems and the aftermath of the government's attempted solution will certainly be added to that list.

"I don't necessarily see an academic integrity problem with posting notes, or the fact that students are paid to post their notes. It's more of the nature of information that's being shared that should be discussed."

There is nothing implemented on the site which prevents students from posting quizzes or tests. In fact, several quizzes have already been posted on the site.

"This now becomes a completely different question," said Dr. Robert Kruschwitz, director of the Center for Christian Ethics and professor of philosophy. "In some cases, professors release their exams, and you can't prevent students from doing what they wish with them. But this is when it becomes a serious ethical issue. I'd rather a student just come to me and ask to see an old exam."

The danger of the site rests in the fact that students may get too comfortable with the convenience of notes online.

"It's not that this is considered cheating; both the note poster and the downloader know what's going on," Kruschwitz said. "I'd normally think you wouldn't reduce something like this to a business, but it only becomes a problem when someone thinks that these online notes are a better way of learning."

The temptation for students to download notes in lieu of attending class would be curbed by Baylor's attendance policy.

"The attendance policy helps encourage students to be responsible," Kruschwitz said. "It keeps students from abusing a site like this."

No Baylor students are currently registered on the site.

"It is my belief that if Baylor students began using this site, most would want students to use it with extreme caution — to ask themselves if they think this is a shortcut to education," Kruschwitz said. "In the case of illness or unavoidable absence, it could be a useful tool, but should be used with great prudence."

Though students are able to zoom in and fully preview a set of notes before downloading, Kruschwitz said he wonders whether it is really worth the time and effort.

"This strikes me as another case of someone who figured out a way to make money off of folks who don't understand what it is to earn an education," he said. "Education is not about getting the right answer on the test, and that's something people misunderstand often. This site seems to just trivialize education."

around we're working this area pretty heavily," he said. Officers usually investigate areas with complaints of drug use and loitering.

"Is this the only reason (for the decline)? No, probably not. But maybe this is a main contributor. We definitely think so," Anderson said.

Eleven of the arrested in the sting operation had no history of violent crime and were not put in jail.

Instead, they were issued a summons to appear at the "John School" at the Municipal Court Oct. 2.

A "John School" is a one-day intervention class for first-time solicitation of prostitution offenders, who must pay $200 to attend and stay out of jail.

"It's mainly to teach (offenders) that you don't know what kind of diseases you're going to bring home to your wife or your girlfriend," Anderson said. "Maybe we can get that message out to men who go and pick up hookers."

"Prostitution is one of the so-called 'victimless' crimes. It tends to be prevalent in areas where there are a dearth of economic opportunities for women, places where women lack basic job skills, and in places where women are easily exploited," Mencken said.

The offense of solicitation of prostitution is classified as a Class B misdemeanor and can carry a sentence of up to 180 days in jail and/or a fine of $2000, according to the City of Waco Web site.
